Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an implantable stent, which is suitable for use in tubular structures of animals and humans. 2. Description of the Related Art There is an active research on endovascular stents in order to treat a stenosis in blood vessels and, in particular, a patent ductus arteriosus. A patent ductus arteriosus is a vessel at the periphery of the heart between the ascending aorta and the main pulmonary artery. It opens into the left ventricle of the heart and permits blood to flow from the left ventricle to the aorta for supply to the body. In the fetus, this duct is approximately one-half to one-third of the diameter of the ascending aorta. It normally closes within four to six weeks after birth, although it may persist into adulthood. The duct closes primarily because of the decreased amount of oxygen in the blood of the fetus. If the duct is left open, however, excessive amounts of blood flow to the fetus result in hypertension in the newborn. An atrial septal defect (ASD) is the most common congenital heart disease in the United States and is present in approximately 1 in 500 live births. It is diagnosed in the first year of life in 60% of cases. During infancy and early childhood, the defects are progressive in size, such that half of children born with an ASD require open surgical repair or placement of a shunt by the age of five years. Although ASD is the most common cause of congenital heart disease, other causes are less frequent, such as ventricular septal defect (VSD), left-sided hypertrophic cardiomyopathy and restrictive cardiomyopathy. Other causes of congenital heart disease include transposition of the great arteries, tetralogy of Fallot, transposition of the great vessels, hypoplastic left heart syndrome and hypoplastic right heart syndrome. An ostium secundum atrial septal defect (ASD) is a hole in the wall separating the two chambers of the heart through which blood can flow directly from the right to the left atrium. This creates
